Book Project

The Demographic Clock

Demography creates the foundation on which the economic potential of nations and the dynamics of the international system are built. A consequence of economic success is the reduction of fertility and in turn the possibility of the generation following being smaller than the one before. This Demographic Transition has become a sign of economic success with population growth becoming a signal of failure. The potential of population can be wasted. Baby booms caused by severe wars offer opportunity. They can be harnessed via policies of education, economic freedom, and then economic growth to create larger and hopefully, richer nations. But, it is what happens next that matters. The clock is ticking either started by the after-effects of unexpected booms or started by successful economic growth. The decisions you can make with an aged population are dependent on those you made when young. The chance does not come again and this book explores how immigration, gender equality, and discrimination radically alter the dynamics of population, and through that all economic and political choices that follow. The domestic creates the international as hegemony and the changing hierarchies of the international community come first from power and power comes from the output and abilities of population. Demography is not destiny. It's potential. (Manuscript in process)
